BIOGRAPHY

Born in 1972, Florian Ruiz lives and works in Japan.

Florian Ruiz is a French photographer who creates projects to express atmospheres, feelings, and sensations of desolate places. In his recent works, he seeks to test the boundaries of photography by challenging its ability to render an image of what is invisible to the eye by means of time and distortion. He uses assembly, collage, super impression; processes that reinvent and transform the actual landscape. He favors a pinhole camera to portray the unexpected, the fortuitous, and the deformed as a multiple reality.

Florian RUIZ

With The White Contamination series, Florian Ruiz (winner of the 2018 Sony Prize) captured the invisible pain of radiation in the snowy landscapes of the heights of Fukushima after the nuclear accident. The photographer measured the radioactive contamination with a Geiger counter, in becquerels (Bq), a unit that expresses the disintegration of the atom and the number of its mutations per second. By a process of staggered superimpression, Florian Ruiz hoped to catch the fleeting moments, the movements of climatic phenomena and the ever-shifting perceptions of nature, where radiation accumulates the most. A feeling of malaise and danger underlies these white spaces, inspired by the aesthetics of traditional Japanese prints.

Following his project, The White Contamination, Florian Ruiz presents Project 596, a photographic work realized from 2014 to 2019 in which the photographer focuses on the old salt lake Lop Nor, in China, located in the Xinjiang province in the northwest of the country. Now almost dried-up, it served as a nuclear weapon testing site from 1964 to 1996. Nowadays, the region is still very contaminated, and in 2008, China recognized the presence of health problems among civilians and military personnel due to radiation exposure. Florian Ruiz reveals the presence of radioactivity by measuring the radioactive contamination with a Geiger counter, as for The White Contamination. He wanted to show, by a digital process, a reality modified by the presence of invisible radioactivity. The process reinvents and twists the very landscape, leading to a kind of vertigo or malaise, a threatening danger hidden behind the landscapes. Here too, Florian Ruiz succeeds in sublimating the ugliness of these spaces, creating beautiful pale blue landscapes.

Florian Ruiz's photography is resolutely representative of atmospheres. For him, it's a question of translating a subjective universe of impression: the image is present to translate the emotion, the feeling that a landscape gives us. Through the two series gathered here, Florian Ruiz sees and shows landscapes resulting from a chaotic and unstable world, while underlining the permanence of beauty within them.
